worth living-a happy home, health, strength and the power to do good that wealth brings. It was more than merely "sad" to see this woman cut down in her prime. And the self restraint, the dignity, the resignation with which she considered and met her fate combined to make her grief astruly noble as sorrow ever was.

She died and was laid in state; and hundreds—nay thousands—paid her the ungrudging tribute of respectful grief. Transient grief for the most park—we cannot mourn long, unless the shaft pierce the heart of our personal lives—but sincere grief, surely. The tenants of Pauahi's large estates came and camped man cut down in her prime. And the self reof Pauahi's large estates came and camped upon the premises. Life long triends-native and half white and white-made the funeral preparations their first work. In the big basement of the great house, where the dead mistress lay in her chill cerements, deft-fingered natives, men and women and children, worked tirelessly to make kahilis in her honor.
